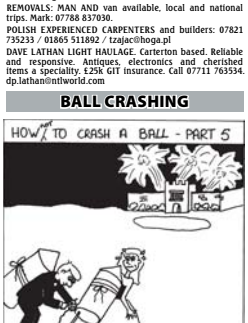
BALL CRASHING



THEATRE REVIEW

The English Game by Richard Bean

Oxford Playhouse, to Sat June 7th. See theatre listings, left.

Cricket has been the inspiration for some splendid words. From Sir Henry Newbolt's Vital Lampada:

"There's a breathless hush in the Close tonight
Ten to make and the match to win..."

From Francis Thompson's At Lords:

"For the field is full of shades as I near a shadowy coast,
And a ghostly batsman plays to the bowling of a ghost,
And I look through my tears on a soundless-clapping host."

And even from A.A.Milne's Ode To my Cricket Bat:

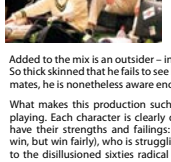
"Revered, beloved, O you whose job
Is but to serve throughout the season
To make, if so be it, a blob."

Added to the canon is Richard Bean's splendid play. Set on a Sunday in a South London cricket ground, it provides the ideal setting to pull together a group of disparate souls of all ages and different degrees of world-weariness. What unites and divides them is the timeless ritual of a sporting contest and how much it matters.



The group of eleven players, bolstered by the opposition's captain and the father of the club fixture secretary / tea maker / organiser - every club has and needs one – represent types who would only associate in the theatre of club sport. A rock star, an actor, a lay preaching GP, a journalist, a schoolboy, a plumber and others are cleverly mixed to create the normal tensions that anyone who plays club sport at any level will recognise.

Added to the mix is an outsider – in this case a Daily Mail reading, card carrying member of Little England. So thick skinned that he fails to see his casually racist and boorish attitudes are not shared by his new team mates, he is nonetheless aware enough of the presence of a schoolboy to be concerned at bad language.

What makes this production such a joy is the wonderful ensemble playing. Each character is clearly defined and well realised. They all have their strengths and failings: from the captain (determined to win, but win fairly), who is struggling to survive his loveless marriage, to the disillusioned sixties radical who has become embittered and increasingly conservative; from the rock star joker whose gags hide insecurities to the GP who wants everything to be 'nice' but finds it beyond his powers to make this so.

What the play shows is distilled from reality. I have only to look at the hockey club I play for to recognise similar types and behaviours, hesitating to identify which player best represents me – a job I will leave to others! The skilful direction of Sean Holmes balanced the humour with the moments of tension, through well-judged pace and pause; enhancing the words and relationships to convey life through the metaphor of cricket. Congratulations to the excellent cast and to Anthony Lamble for his splendid design.

I can heartily recommend this production for anyone and everyone, but I believe that club sportsmen and sportswomen will understand best this most English of plays about this most English of games.

THEATRE REVIEW

The Tempest

Worcester College, to Sat June 7th. See theatre listings, left.

(NB audience will be required to stand / move around for much of the play.)

It was the drool on Sam Kennedy's chin that summed it all up. It takes real physical and dramatic commitment to be able to run around with a streak of cold, glutinous phlegm hanging from your face and he – and this production - had these in spades.

The physical commitment was in evidence from the very start – despite a day's worth of rain having turned much of the performance space into a swamp an earlier decision to move indoors had been rescinded, on the basis of what can't have been more than an hour of dry weather. But it was also visible throughout as the cast clambered and crawled their way around the gardens

The elemental ceremony that accompanied the marriage of Miranda (Nai Webb) and Sebastian (Mark Penwill) was a notable example – the gyrating, drumming nymph quartet managed to invest one of Shakespeare's more irritatingly weedy young couples with an unexpected erotic grandeur.

The dramatic commitment was shown both on and off-stage. Directorial team Toby Pitts-Tucker and Salmaan Mirza made some fine decisions – while their deft handling of the text gave them the confidence to allow their cast a little improvisation (particularly in the excellent, robust clowning of Charmaine Lazenby as Stephano), they were not so blankly reverent that they could not allow lines to be garbled, swallowed or drowned out by music if the theatre of the situation demanded it. To return to Sam Kennedy, his Caliban was genuinely distressing – a stuttering, spitting man-child who manages to inspire sufficient disgust for us to come to a somewhat guilty understanding of Prospero's cruelty.

There were a few flaws. Maanas Jain's full-on capering as Ariel got a little wearing. Colin Burnie's Prospero gave a performance straight out of the orotund, slightly windy school of a previous generation of Shakespearian actors – although this occasionally worked in his favour, making the character seem genuinely 'out of time'. The promenade space was not used as imaginatively as it could have been – a lot of the time we were simply watching stuff happen in front of us in a way that could have worked equally well on an indoor stage.

These, however, really are quibbles. This was an excellent piece by anyone's standards. Brave, thoughtful and (a rarer quality than you'd imagine) genuinely theatrical, the only thing that separated it from 'professional' theatre was the presence of a paycheck.
