THEATRE REVIEW
The Topsy-Turvy World of Gilbert and Sullivan
 Oxford Playhouse, Sat. 5th June 2004

Topsy Turvy is a production by the Oxford University Gilbert and Sullivan Society. We were initially wondering if the play would be a version of the film by Mike Leigh, a medley of the major works of Gilbert and Sullivan, interspersed with a brief history of the background of their musicals, so it was more of a history lesson than a play! In between the songs, small scenes were staged to discuss the success of the plays. The actors playing Gilbert, Sullivan and others, such as Gilbert's wife, Kitty, addressed the audience to inform us of the year the play was originally produced and any problems that had arisen behind the scenes or with the cast. This technique was effective in conveying the relevant details of the play, and the actors were entertaining and competent in their roles. Alexander Morrison was especially good as the pompous Gilbert. The main focus of the production however, was of course the songs. All were performed with enthusiasm, and although some voices were weaker than others (as you might expect from a university society production), all the singers had a passion for the songs which really shine through.

As a newcomer to Gilbert and Sullivan, it was interesting to see an overview of their songs, and several pieces made me long to see the full production from which they hailed; notably Prates of Penzance and Trial by Jury, both of which were sung incredibly well, and had us laughing out loud.
 Both my friend and I noticed that one downside to being new to Gilbert and Sullivan was that as some songs were sang so quickly, it was difficult to understand the words and know what was going on. This may have been due to the sound quality in the theatre, or the speed, but there were
