POTTER'S OXFORD
TALES OF OXFORDSHIRE
 Ride a cock horse to Banbury Cross To see a fine lady upon a white horse where Fair Rosamund, Henry II's mistress, took refuge Queen Eleanor tried to poison her.
 Rings on her fingers and bells on her toes, She shall have music wherever she goes
 Minster Lovell: ruins of the manor house, haunted by a girl who died here on her wedding night
 Four local teams perform the Cotswold Morris: Avington, Bampton, Headington & Chipping Campden
 On May Day, children walk through the village with crosses made of flowers
 Chariton on Otmoor

1. The Rollright legend is as follows. A king and his army had conquered all England as far north as Little Rollright when they met a witch who said:
 'Seven long strides thou shalt take
 If Long Compton thou canst see
 King of England thou shalt be.'
 Knowing Long Compton was just over the next hill, the King took seven strides - but a mound obscured his view. Cackling, the witch cried 'Since Long Compton thou canst not see, thou and thy men horestones shall be'. The King and his army had been waiting 2000 years for someone with strong enough magic to release them.
 2. While Mediaeval Banbury had 3 crosses, only one remained by 1602, and this was destroyed by a Puritan mob. The present cross was built in 1859, commemorating the marriage of Princess Victoria and Prince Frederic William of Prussia. The statues of Queen Victoria, Edward VII and George V were added in honour of King George V's coronation in 1911. A cock horse can mean coach horse - or a high-spirited one - or a child's hobby-horse. The 19th century London-Banbury coach used to stop at the bottom of Stanmore Hill to bolt on a fifth horse - usually decorated with ribbons. The local children would gather to watch, and chant 'Ride a cock horse to Banbury cross'.
 3. Various gruesome tales are associated with Minster Lovell, a Yorkist stronghold. A 16th century Lord of the Manor, escaping the forces of the Lancastrian Henry VII, is supposed to have starved to death in a secret room having entrusted the key to a servant who was either killed or betrayed him. According to another story, the young bride of one of the lords disappeared on her wedding night during a game of hide-and-seek. Her bones were found years later in an old chest whose lid had been too heavy to lift.
 4. It is not known whether Fair Rosamund died at the hands of Queen Eleanor, but the Queen was unpopular, and any unpleasant rumours would have spread quickly. However Rosamund died, Henry II had a magnificent tomb erected in the chapel, which was constantly attended by the nuns. Bishop Hugh of Lincoln (Hugh as in St Hugh's college), shocked by such devotion to the memory of a mistress, insisted on her remains being moved outside the church. As soon as he had gone, the nuns gathered them up into a leather bag, which they kept in a lead coffin in their chapter house until the dissolution of the nunnery.
 5. The term 'morriss' may come from 'moorish', as dancers in ancient fertility rites blackened their faces. Nowadays, the dancers dress in white clothes with bells and streamers for decoration. They can be seen in Oxford on May Day and at other public holidays. Local teams follow the tradition of the Cotswold morris, using handkerchiefs, sticks and handclaps for teams of 6 men, as well as jigs (for single men or pairs).
 6. The May Day crosses in Charlton on Otmoor are a christian version of pagan celebrations of spring.

Consciousness: Confessions of Romantic Reductionist
 Professor Christof Koch gives this year's lecture for the public understanding of science. Oxford Playhouse: November 5th, 5pm.
 This year's Charles Simonyi Lecture tackled the massive - and massively popular - topic of the neurobiology of consciousness (what is it, what do we know about it, what are its limits) and the various experiments and schools of thought surrounding the very concept of 'consciousness'.
 Speaker Christof Koch (Professor of Biology and Engineering at the California Institute of Technology) - whilst not quite taking us down to the level of 'science for dummies' - certainly managed to make the concept of consciousness more accessible on a ground level and to a wider audience. This is a lecture intended to further the public understanding of science, after all. Koch was an enjoyable speaker; humorous, light-hearted yet delivering high quality content to please laymen and academics alike. An amiable and self-deprecating extreme sports addict, his energy and enthusiasm for his subject helped keep the audience interested during the 'science bits' and his use of contemporary celebrities kept the findings relevant and understandable. Descriptions of how subjects responded to images of Jennifer Aniston, Halle Berry and Marilyn Monroe made the process of measuring consciousness seem simpler and more accessible.
 The talk was an excellent way of communicating a previously philosophical subject and explaining how it is now considered more of a scientific theory, there being increasing ongoing scientific research building up a body of evidence to back up the theories of what consciousness is. Overall, the talk was kept simple enough for the general public to understand while being scientific enough to please the academics in the audience (a skill not available to every lecturer!). I thoroughly support the notion of making academic (and particularly, scientific) knowledge more accessible, though I wouldn't recommend this lecture for children as it was pitched at an adult level. Sixth-formers up to first-year students would no doubt have found it an interesting addition to their curriculum.
