Taken from Mary Potter's Oxford Calendar, 1986

1. Disputes between Oxford and Wolvercot over the ownership of Port Meadow raged from the 13th to the 20th century. The Abbot of Godstow several times blocked the main burgesses' entrance (then by Aristotle Lane) and was required by law to repair it. By 1970, grazing rights established by 130 Wolvercot householders (entitled to graze anything from a few geese to 60 head of cattle each) outweighed those established by Oxford Freeman. However, once a year the Sheriff of Oxford would ride out with the Freeman to impound the animals. They were then given back to their owners on payment of a £3 fine. The date changed from year to year, and was kept a strict secret beforehand. The Sheriff usually conducted operations from horseback, except for one in the early sixties who, as a member of the RAF, preferred to do so from a helicopter.

2. While Port Meadow is now common land, tempers still run high when there is any suggestion of change or development. Not only do the local residents enjoy the possibility of country walks just beyond their back gates, but the ecology of the boggy ground, left virtually

THEATRE REVIEW

Measure for Measure

Corpus Christi College until Fri 14th

Measure for Measure is a difficult play to categorize. Neither comedy nor tragedy, it has both humorous moments and serious themes. The story kicks off with the Duke leaving his city in the care of Lord Angelo, his deputy. His Machiavellian plan is that Angelo will enforce the laws he has let slacken so he doesn't have to lose his popularity, while he watches in the guise of a friar. When young Claudio is taken up for sleeping with his wife-to-be and sentenced to death, his friend Lucio rushes to fetch Claudio's sister Isabella from the convent where she's about to enter the novitiate to persuade Angelo to change his mind. And so it goes on, in the convoluted manner of all Shakespeare plots. The play has been stripped down to the bones, which gives it a sense of directness and plenty of pace.

The staging was very sparse, which seemed to suit the enclosed setting, if also a little fragile at times (with only a loose curtain separating the stage and the wings). The costuming overall was a little haphazard, and generally plain. (The Duke in particular needed a little more of a cowl to make his friar's disguise feel right - it's hard to hide your face under a hat!) The best character here was Lucio - the closest thing to Eddie Izzard you'll see in a student production. He also produces an admirable performance as the louche man about town, well meaning but slanderous. All the cast slipped extremely naturally into the mannered exchanges of Shakespeare's English, putting the sense over clearly. Olivia Grant (Isabella) produced a very believable performance of a sister trying desperately to help her brother in any way she could, the sometimes convoluted phrasing of her appeals seeming natural. Kieran Wanduragala as Angelo showed how the mighty can be lowered and Micha Lazarus as the Duke was excellent, determining like a hand behind the curtain that all things should come right. The entire cast gave good strong performances, creating what was altogether a very enjoyable production.
