REVIEW: CINEMA
Ginger Snaps (18)
Ultimate Picture Palace from Friday 13th July

I love this film. It's only a teenage werewolf horror comedy, but really, what more do you want? It's taut, fresh, rude, funny, scary and clever. The dialogue is superb, and the growling is just great. Predictably enough, given these attributes, it's a debut feature from outside Hollywood, which had to fight for its general release.

Brigitte and Ginger are sisters, cynical goth-like outcasts in a teenage world of nice teeth, ankle socks and dating. They have agreed on a suicide pact at sixteen, rather than turn into the people they see around them. So far, so Heathers.

However, Ginger's long-awaited first period attracts an attack from whatever has been mining the neighbourhood's canines. The beast is killed by a van, but not before passing on its "infection". The results are initially very funny as the symptoms of budding lycanthropy are understandably mistaken for those of puberty.

As the film progresses the humour gets darker and darker as the girls, chiefly Brigitte, struggle to conceal Ginger's deeds and to find a cure. Ginger herself, though, becomes increasingly uncooperative as she starts to lose her humanity and revel in her power. The girls' mother founders wonderfully through all this, attempting to relate to them as teenagers in an excruciatingly understanding way.
