REVIEW : EXHIBITION

David Goldblatt: Fifty-One Years

At Modern Art Oxford (Formerly MOMA) until 30/03/03

David Goldblatt's photographs document the social, personal and political history of South Africa from the 1950's to the current day. If you didn't like the previous exhibition here, which saw Tracey Emin in all her self-obsessed glory, then the skill and perceptive outlook of Goldblatt will come as a refreshing change.

Themed as photographic essays, black and white images line the walls tracing aspects of everyday life through the struggle of apartheid to the present legacy that it has left. The second-class crowded transport system that black people had to travel in is shown in contrast to ordered rows of cars heading north from Johannesburg to the suburbs of the white middle class. The Shaft-sinking scene shows the gritty reality of gold mining and the black labour that whites depended on for their own decadence. But the work is not a moral lecture, no violent protest, just a simple portrayal of the complexity of the era exposing the embedded workings of racism and the resistance of those in opposition to it. The skillfully captured facial expressions of the people in the photographs hint not only at the underlying values of South Africa but also at our perception of it as we are standing in the Gallery.

Black humanity is given respect in a situation where this consideration would have been dangerously radical. These beautiful images seem like windows onto South African lives and show a deep understanding of the human condition. A few recent colour photographs
