THEATRE REVIEW

Romeo and Juliet

Oxford Playhouse, 9 - 13th November 2010

Given the worldwide popularity of Romeo and Juliet, the main difficulty for any theatre company intent on producing Shakespeare's play is to create something that will stand out from the many theatrical offerings that have come before it. This version, presented collaboratively by Pilot Theatre and York Theatre Royal, challenges many of the conventional aspects of the play. Whether such changes are met with appreciation or disapproval by viewers, this production certainly stands out and should be applauded for its willingness to try out an innovative approach to the work. Whilst the play undoubtedly has its flaws, overall it works to powerful effect.

The most obvious deviations from conventional Shakespeare are the stage setting, the modern dress and scaled-down cast (with eight actors covering all the parts). The stage is strewn with flowers, an assortment of colours bunched together in the shape of a heart and hanging from the frame of the set. The flowers, we are told in the programme, symbolise the different stages of the story as it unfolds. Oliver Wilson and Rachel Spicer play the two 'star-cross'd lovers', Wilson adopting a conventional, somewhat 'safe' take on Romeo, whilst Spicer's Juliet has something of the bolshie love-struck teenager in her. The latter makes a refreshing change to the prevailing saintly impression of Shakespeare's heroine. Indeed, Spicer's performance, whilst not to the traditionalists' tastes, is notable for the way in which such a young actress (fresh out of Drama School) can offer such a confident and different rendition of one of the most famous Shakespearean parts. Interestingly, though, the depth of Romeo and Juliet's relationship is not at the forefront of this production. Instead, themes emerge that demonstrate the play's enduring power and ability to encroach on modern society: divided classes; street crime; forbidden love; strained familial relationships and the pain of loss. What is more, it is the secondary characters of the play that particularly make an impression. Benvolio and Mercutio, played by Bryn Holding and Chris Lindon respectively, shine as the mischievous Montague cousins full of moral bravado and bawdy wit. Louisa Eyo is brilliant as Juliet's loving, loyal Nurse. The most moving scene, occurs at the discovery of the apparently dead Juliet, Mary Rose as Lady Capulet capturing the mother's grief with haunting profundity, whilst her guilt-stricken husband (played by William Travis) realises his faults too late.

The audience for tonight's show is made up of a lot of school children, which is always encouraging to see. What is even more encouraging is the fact that this production is not afraid of trying out untested ideas for one of Shakespeare's most celebrated plays and risking the wrath of Shakespearean purists.
