THEATRE REVIEW

St Philip and St James Church, Woodstock Rd, 15 - 17th March

Prince of Denmark

How deliciously irresistible to see this presented in Oxford in the same week as the 'real' Hamlet (currently playing at Blackwell's Bookshop), since this is an audacious 'pre-quel' - set ten years before Shakespeare's play when Hamlet, Laertes, Ophelia etc., are still in their teens.
 First of all, much praise to the actors, all of whom are actual teenagers. It was a magnificently physical production, with some menacing dances that economically demonstrated the state of gender relations in early modern Denmark plus absolutely top notch and first rate fight sequences, which I have rarely seen equalled in grown-up productions, all superbly choreographed with fencing sabres. This includes the climactic duel, fought with buttons off and no protective clothing - we hope they manage to get through all the performances without skewering one another.

The play itself was entirely plausible as an extrapolation from what we know of the characters in Hamlet. Ask yourself: why on earth was Hamlet spending years studying at Wittenberg if he's the heir to the throne? He has to be at least twenty seven or so in the 'real' Hamlet, if he can remember Yorick, and Yorick has been in the ground for twenty three years, as the grave-digger claims. Prince of Denmark accounts for the gap with an exile imposed on him for offences which it proceeds to show us.
