XML Digital Content Executive - (Entry Level)
 Are you a curious, analytical problem-solver looking to start your career in publishing? We're looking for someone with a basic understanding or experience of both XML and the publishing industry.
 The role holder will be able to identify problems with the XML / electronic content side of our digital content management system and look for ways to make it better. You don't need to be an XML guru, you just need to understand it - perhaps through an IT related degree / other course or even better, through previous commercial experience.
 This role requires knowledge of XML, SGML, HTML or other tagged languages and experience of using Microsoft Office systems and processes.
 Knowledge of DTDs and schemas, CSS/Stylsheets/Xpath and graphics, PDFs, and e-production experience in publishing would be an advantage.
 For more information and to apply online please see our careers page at www.wiley.com
 Closing date: 2 December 2012

EXHIBITION REVIEW EXTRACT: TOP 5 REASONS TO SEE...

Threads Of Silk and Gold: Ornamental Textiles From Meiji Japan
 At the Ashmolean until 17th January.
1. It's stunning.
 One of my favourite pieces shows cranes and wisteria. The striking colour contrasts mean it's gorgeous from across a room, while the detail means it's wonderful from an inch away. All around the room you can hear people playing the "Which of these would you most want to take home" game. Everyone seems to have a different favourite.
2. It's specific.
 The Ashmolean can be a bit daunting because it contains such a range of times, media, cultures, peoples, and styles. Forget about trying to cram all that culture into your brain - in this exhibition focuses on one medium (silk embroidery) practised in one country (Japan) in one era (the Meiji) which spanned 44 years (1868 - 1912).
3. It's impressive.
 My god, it is impressive. Even if you're not such of a one for embroidery this is still extraordinary. It's an exhibition which gets complete strangers talking to each other, united in flabbergastion. It's an exhibition where they've borrowed the family-friendly hand lenses (available in a box by the door) so you can settle the argument once and for all that it really isn't painted, it's stitched.
4. The history is interesting too.
 I'm not a particular historian, but I love learning snippery facts in a way that doesn't feel like history. These textiles are a fascinating window onto a period where Japonisme was all the rage and where Japan was seeing itself to the West.
5. It's now or never.
 Yes, I know people are always selling exhibitions on the "last chance to see X before it leave the country" ticket, but nearly all of these textiles have been gathered together (and bought) by the Miyomizu-Sannenzaka Museum in Kyoto. The Ashmolean is the only place they'll be exhibited before going to their new home. So it's not the last chance to see them, but you'd have to travel!
 And one for luck, in case you're not already convinced...
6. It'll make you want to have a go.
 There's something about the excellence on show that makes you feel simultaneously inadequate and itching to pick up a needle and thread. The Ashmolean are clearly expecting this, as shown by the very desirable Thread To books on sale in the exhibition shop, and the Big Stitch Day they're holding on 1st December. The Embroiderers Guild will be there running free workshops for adults and children, and you can sign up online.
