THEATRE REVIEW
Jeffrey Bernard is Unwell
 Oxford Playhouse, 16th-21st May
 Journalist Jeffrey Bernard is... unwell. Only this time, it's not an excuse printed by his editor to explain the absence of his weekly column; it's because he started drinking aged around 14 and never stopped. Far from slowing as he aged, he seems to have picked up speed - adding in horses, womanising, partying and an impressive roster of bohemian friends and drinking partners until life was the messy, thunderous fart of a crescendo playing out before us.

Jeffrey Bernard is Unwell
 Writer Keith Waterhouse lays out a fitting tribute to Bernard, his friend and drinking companion, which - wonderfully enough - began to play in 1989, some 8 years before Bernard knocked back his final drink. The story is simple: waking up pissed, alone and accidentally locked into his local (The Coach & Horses, Soho), Bernard embarks on his own autobiography via a night of amusing anecdotes. The tales are illustrated by an excellent supporting cast of four (all familiar young faces of British stage and screen - most notably Rebecca Lacey, a fabulous character actress reminiscent of a young Prunella Scales); before us flit Waterhouse himself, Francis Bacon, Muriel Belcher, John Le Mesurier and a host of other colourful, inebriated characters. As Bernard opens a window into his art-filled life, we glimpse treasure through the 99% proof mist. The things he must have done, the people he must have met! If only he could bloody well remember.
