Breaking & Entering (15)

Currently showing: Odeon George Street, Vue Cinema

A good-looking drama about fraught relationships in 21st century North London, Breaking and Entering is fascinating and solid in its first half, but collapses into interminable awfulness in its second.

Jude Law plays an architect called Will, who together with his business partner Sandy (Martin Freeman), relocates his business to King's Cross in the hope of transforming the surrounding area. Will's homelife is on the brink of collapse; his long term partner Liv (Robin Wright Penn) is tring of his arrogance and emotional short-sightedness and is increasingly creating under the strain part upon her by her obsessive-compulsive, borderline autistic daughter. Into this world of middle class angus stumbles Miro (Rafi Gavron), a teenager who was born in Sarajevo but brought up in London after fleeing the Balkan war with his mother Amira (Julietre Binoche). Working for a gang of thieves presided over by his unde Vlado (Velibor Topic). Miro steals Wills Jappof from the company offices, setting in motion a series of events which culminates in Will and Amira embarking on an ambiguous amour four.

and Amira embarking on an ambiguous amour Jou.

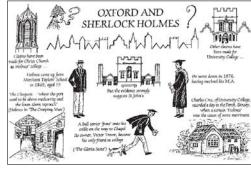

After a slightly petentious opening sequence involving a voice over from Law, Breaking and Entering quickly works itself up into a tight, funny, moving and involving drama. Although the central conceit of the plot is not without its problems (we are meant to see the two families as mirror images of each other, but this somehow often feels like the same story being told twice), there's enough carefully thought out scenes and good dialogue to hold the attention. Cameo appearances by Ray Winstone and Juliette Stevenson (as sympathetic plain olothes cop and liberal psychologist respectively) are mostly successful, and there's superb and witty interplay, especially in one scene between Will, Sandy, the office cleaner and a local hooker, and another in which Will berates his staff for accusing the cleaners of being behind the thefts.

Once the relationship between Will and Amira actually begins though, it all goes badly wrong: the plot becomes increasingly contrived, the social drama aspect of the film turns inauthentic and insulting, and the emoting degenerates into face and melodurans. The dialogue, so rich and true to life falberi a middle class movie idea of life) early in the film, gets bogged down in cod philosophy and lukewarm metaphor, and the way the film ties things up at the end is very difficult to take. Ultimately, it's a blessing that Minghella knew how to cast. Although Law (like the film) outstays his welcome, thank god for Binoche and Penum the former had me crying like a big gift's blosue, and I never thought 14 see the latter give a performance of this strength and depth. By the end, you're only really watching to see what miracle these two supperb acterises can work with whatever silly situation or badly written line the script is surely bound to throw at them next.

George Sawer

MARY POTTER'S OXFORD

Although it is by no means certain that Sherlock Holmes attended Oxford University his reference as "this inhospitable town" in The Missing Three Quarter seems to weigh the balance heavily As far as college is concerned, the evidence is even less conclusive. A Mr E G A Holmes came up to St John's in 1869, from Merchant Taylor's School, to read Literae Humaniores. Presumably he pursued his interest in chemistry during the vacations; indeed, in The Gloria Scott Holmes mentions performing experiments in the long vacation.

However, also in The Gloria Scott is an episode at college involving a bull terrier. Dogs were not allowed in the grounds of any college except University College, suggesting that it may have been here that the sleuth spent his student days.
