THEATRE REVIEW
Hippolytus
 Burton Taylor Studio, Sat May 24th. See Theatre listings, left.
 The music looped over and over again, as the actors stood frozen on the stage, waiting for the audience to file in. After what seemed like an eternity, one of the figures snapped her fingers, and all was quiet in the room. She launched into a dramatic monologue, introducing herself as Aphrodite, Goddess of Love.
 Aphrodite has been scorned by a young man by the name of Hippolytus, who has devoted himself to the Goddess Artemis and a chaste life. To punish him, Aphrodite makes his stepmother Phaedra fall in love with him. Hippolytus rejects her and she takes her own life, but with Hippolytus' father Theseus discovers his dead wife, he curses Hippolytus for apparently raping and killing her. Despite Hippolytus' denials, he is killed in an accident.
 Originally written by Euripides in 423 BC, this tale of Greek tragedy is brought to the stage by Oxford University Student Drama. Their interpretation of this classic play involves physical theatre, where body movement is a key part of the performance. The Goddesses Aphrodite and Artemis seemed to push and pull the morals around the stage, as they mediated with their lives. The simplicity of the set and costumes was a good foil to the dramatic and empathically physical performance of the actors, and the physical side was an interesting addition to an otherwise classically acted performance.
