THEATRE REVIEW

Oleanna by David Mamet
Old Fire Station until Friday 23rd

Oleanna is a nightmarish vision. Its world is one in which political correctness allows language to be so undermined that it can no longer be relied upon as our means of representing ourselves. This nightmare is also very plausible, however, and this is what makes David Mamet's play such a compelling piece to watch.

A college professor, John, and his student, Carol, have their first interview at Carol's instigation. She wants an explanation of John's classes, his book, and of his teaching method; she is angry and upset because she does not understand what she is supposed to be learning. He tries to help her, but cannot tear her away from an obsession with literalness which leads to misunderstanding and, disastrously for John, misquoting.

John is anti-establishment yet in the establishment; although he questions the values of higher education, he is still forced to work within its parameters. Carol is anti-establishment too: for her, however, the establishment is John, and his attitudes and methods of teaching. Their second interview takes place after she has filed an official complaint against him, alleging sexism, tyranny, flirtation and attempted bribery. The complaints are all drawn from misinterpretations of John's attempts to help Carol with the difficulties she is having with the course. Being either deliberately malicious, or vastly mistaken, she misquotes her professor and incriminates him in numerous ways.

John finds himself unable to refute Carol's complaints because she has become, through her minority status, more powerful than he. Language, which should be available to John as an adequately descriptive and precise means of communication, is disabled by the imposed reading of political correctness which pollutes his every word. When he cannot articulate himself verbally he resorts to physical force, but this only fuels Carol's case against him.

By the end of the play the audience is bound to sympathise with John. Carol uses language as a weapon against him so effectively that his violent retaliation is understandable, even if it is not in itself a good thing. John may be a little tyrannical in the classroom, he may enjoy the power he has as a teacher, but this power is inherent in his position, and we have no reason to suppose that he has abused it. Carol however challenges the very model of a student-teacher relationship. She is able to destroy his life because the establishment which should support and uphold John's position is perverted by the influence of political correctness and positive discrimination.

This is a powerful play, and the character of John is compellingly played by Chris MacDonnell. His counterpart Amy Bayless portrays Carol to gently however. Where her insidious words should be spat out, they are too perfectly recited to be convincing, although she does achieve a good dramatic tension, especially in the later scenes of the play. The production communicates very well the frustration which occurs when a person is denied the possibility of speaking for themselves. It is a pertinent reminder for us all, in this age of buzz words and soundbytes, that language is a precious tool without which we are debilitated.

THEATRE REVIEW

The Complete Millennium Musical

Playhouse until Sat 24th

They condensed all of Shakespeare's work into 97 minutes. They turned the Bible into an evening's light entertainment. Now this talented and innovative company is romping round the country presenting "1000 years of World History in 100 minutes". It may sound like an impossible task; in fact it probably is. But the Reduced Shakespeare Company get round this problem by not really attempting to solve it. They simply use the historical framework as a pretext for a rapid succession of their unique brand of hilarious and rather risqué jokes, and for some wickedly funny caricatures of many of the great and good of the last thousand years.

For while not, perhaps, remarkable for its educational content, The Complete Millennium Musical is spectacular in the sheer number and diversity of people and groups at whom it pokes fun. The famous from every age are offered up one by one for merciless mickey-taking: from King John to Hitler; from Leonardo da Vinci to Claude Monet; from Joan of Arc to Monica Lewinski - all are made a source of side-splitting humour. The not-so-famous do not escape either - Mamie Eisenhower suffers on behalf of all those consigned to historical obscurity.

In common with many Millennium revues, The Complete Millennium Musical focuses largely on the last century in order to give some topicality to its humour. This is particularly the case with its music: its musical numbers in fact represent a rather irreverent revue of 20th century pop. Nick Graham's clever score covers virtually all conceivable genres, from Barbershop to Gloria Gainer, and from Country and Western to Noel Coward. The cast all sing well, and the choreography is as impressively slick as it is amusing: look carefully, and you will also see a lightning tour of disco dance crazes.

To some extent, the writers of this piece fell between two stools. While on the one hand mocking the 90's PC brigade, on the other they seem to have been unable entirely to avoid political correctness themselves. And while some of the gags are risqué to the point of being tasteless, on the whole the jokes are never quite rude enough to be absolutely hilarious. Nevertheless, this is an extremely clever and genuinely amusing show, performed with real panache. The topicality and relevance of the humour is even more admirable coming from an American company performing to foreign audiences. The easily offended should probably stay at home, but everyone else should try to see this fast, furious, funny musical treat.
