THEATRE REVIEW

A Streetcar Named Desire

For all of Blanche DuBois' refined mannerisms and quiet drawl (that actress Ruby Thomas should be proud of), her sister Stella's insistence that she must treat her well, as she's family, the relatively demure 1950s hem- and necklines, and comments about "one [drink]" being "my limit", we shouldn't be fooled into thinking we have been transported back to gentler times. The lighting's soft and comforting, the apartment Stanley and Stella Kowalski (James Corrigan and Hannah Roberts) inhabit homely and familiar, and the language refreshingly free of the "Like's, and other, less innocuous, additions to our vernacular, but that doesn't mean that these characters aren't ruled by precisely the same fears and desires as we are today.

The play goes through this breakdown of manners, pretence, and sanity (in order), exposing the motivations of the characters - and they're instantly recognizable: lust, frustration, desire for money, loneliness. Each is played out both subtly and obviously, as in the scene immediately following Stanley and Stella's violent row and making-up (in which we are struck again by the chemistry between the couple and the actors), when Stella says "There are things that happen between a man and a woman in the dark that sorta make everything else... unimportant." You can't help but be a little distrustful of Stanley and Stella after that; in fact, it's difficult to know who to trust, as each departs ever faster from rationality for their own reasons. Ruby Thomas' expressions as her character lies to herself and to others - and then, most frighteningly, when she tells the truth - are disturbing largely

 A woman undergraduate was expected to be in College by 11pm...
 A lecturer's horror at seeing a woman in his audience!
 Compulsory morning chapel was in force until 1952 in some colleges
 No drinking in pubs! ... the Proctor and 'Baldings' were on the prowl...
 "Are you a member of the University?"
 "Your name and College, Sir!"
