A Room of One's Own
Baron Taylor Theatre
Thu 2nd - Sat 4th April

Virginia Woolf's extended essay on women and fiction, now a classic of feminist literature, grew out of two lectures she delivered in 1928 to Newham and Girton Colleges in Cambridge. Her fundamental argument is simple: a woman needs five hundred a year and a room with a lock on the door if she is to write fiction or poetry. By insisting on the link between financial security and intellectual labour, she answers the question she has set for herself: why are women so often written about, rather than actually writing? Why in the Elizabethan age were there no flowerings of female literature when every man and his dog, so it seems, were reeling off sonnets and plays? The blunt answer is that intellectual freedom depends upon material things and women have always been poor.

Clare Dalton and Mark Lindberg's stage adaptation of Woolf's text, currently showing at the Barton Taylor, follows on from an acclaimed production of A Room of One's Own by Eileen
