Mysterious mud-brick installation transforms the lower gallery space at Modern Art Oxford, until Oct 29th 2006

450 bricks have been made in the Chilterns from local clay and straw and then assembled by the artist Ilona Nemeth to form a closed corridor in Modern Art Oxford's lower gallery, to be viewed by one person at a time. The earthy smell of the mudbricks connects the visitor to a traditional process used by a rural Romany community in the artist's native Slovakia; Nemeth herself lives and works near Bratislava. 'The Wall' seems deceptively simple at first, but becomes more complex as the viewer is left alone to make of it what s/he will. Why is the corridor closed off? What is it hiding or dividing?

This spontaneous firing off of questions in the viewers' mind is characteristic of a successful piece of contemporary art. Across the globe, walls carry religious, cultural & all sorts of other loaded meanings. The neutral title given to the work leaves it up to the individual to determine where the piece takes them. Nemeth's installation breaks off a piece of what can be found outside the gallery; stone blocks are used to build the famous colleges that house many layers of history and learning. Contained in the mudbricks themselves is the very fabric of Oxford, the earth.
