Morris Dancing
 A Brief Introduction
 If you've ever heard the clash of sticks, the jingle of bells and the squeeze of squeezeboxes after the choristers have finished on May Morning, you've undoubtedly encountered morris dancing; though you may not have encountered the enormous variety of morris sides and traditions to be seen around Oxfordshire throughout the year.
 How Old is Morris Dancing?
 Nobody's exactly sure, but most reckon that English morris dancing is a development of the morisco, or 'Moorish [dance]', that swept through Europe at about the time the Moors were driven from Spain - a craze that may also have inspired (or been influenced by) Palatoc dance in Spain, Calus dance from Romania, and Tuareg sword dance in Saharan Africa, among others.
 Certainly by Shakespeare's time, morris dancing was an established form in southern England. It slowly declined in popularity but its form was kept fairly well intact by rural communities until the Industrial Revolution, when systematisation of labour and urbanisation jeopardised the character of agricultural village life. However, the morris in Oxfordshire continued to be performed in a few towns, most notably Headington, Eynsham, Bampton and Abingdon.
 It was in 1899 that academic musician Cecil Sharp first encountered the recently-restored Headington Quarry Morris Men and subsequently embarked upon a life's work of collecting the traditional tunes of the English people. Social worker and suffragette Mary Nell collaborated with Sharp to collect the dances, which she then taught to the girls of her Esperance Club in London.
 Their performances, and the 1907 publication of The Morris Book, encouraged several attempts to collect and revive the abandoned village traditions - a process that was frustrated by the Great War, but which would more than regain its momentum in the wake of the American folk revival of the 1950s.
 This second English folk revival saw a wider development of the regional styles and a huge increase in the number of sides: some resurrecting their unique village repertoire, including Adderbury, Ducklington and Kirtlington, but many more combining dances from
