POSSIBLE ORIGINS OF DAILY INFO

The large brightly coloured 'Dailyinfo' sheets have been appearing on College noticeboards around the town for some time now. Where they come from is a bit of a mystery. They say it is produced somewhere on the far bank of the 'Cherwell' - that's why you can't find it - its always on the far bank. We have managed to get a sketch of the works, though (see illustration).
The origin is also obscure but the 'Ides of March' editions are usually partly written in Latin. There is a picture of a copy on the walls of the Senate building in Rome at the time of Julius Caesar. And if he had paid attention to the Personal section, the Empire might have survived.
There are currently no further clues from the 'Dark Ages' or Medieval times. The origin of its present reincarnation depends on whether you prefer the Schiblegreger or Kharakvasia versions. You are going to get the Kharakvasia version.
At the end of the war (WW2 one), I was stationed at Lake Kharakvasia in Bombay Presidency. A signal came from GHQ, Delhi. 'War's over. Swords into ploughshares. Educate the troops'. The Colonel, who came from a minor public school keen on rugby, wasn't very keen on education. 'What do they need it for? Only get above themselves. However, its an order'. He turned to the Major. 'Major?' 'Sir?' 'Fix it.' 'Sir?' The Major turned to the Captain and the Captain turned to me. 'Rose' he barked (first names weren't used much then). 'Get the men educated.' I turned round and, being the most junior chap, found no one else there.
We turned over all the transport to driving instruction and set about improving the sepoy's writing and reading in the Army language, Roman Urdu. It was a mixed unit of Hindus, Muslims, Christians and Sikhs. The Adjutant was a Sikh and half the officers were British.

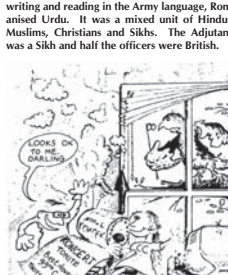

Our attempt to interest the female camp followers, even with chaparones, was not a success - they hid behind the tent flaps and wouldn't come out. Had to be particularly careful with women in India at the time - they usually seemed to belong to somebody who would be frightfully cross if he thought you were getting too close.

The Great White Queen from over the sea had come - some 40 years previously - but the news took time to spread to those in India. I thought we should be the first to get the news. On each notice-board, we had a Dailyinfo sheet about the outside world, to which contributions were invited. Called it Aji Khabar ('Today's news'). I remember an article about a birthday party - chocolate cake and champagne served in Kensington palace. Either Margaret's or Elizabeth's - not sure which. Don't know what the sepoy made of it.

The need for an easy, immediate form of communication was also apparent in the Oxford of the early sixties. I tried to put an ad in the Oxford Mail. You couldn't put it in by phone, so I went down to their office in New Inn Hall St on Thursday afternoon. It was shut along with most other shops in Oxford - early closing day. Incidentally, the last weekday buses went about 10 pm and the city was dead by quarter past. Back again on Friday. 'Could put it in on Monday afternoon, sir'. Fat lot of use that was. And it was expensive. Why not have our own publication and accept ads by phone and immediately? So we did. And we reckoned that with most of the members of each college reading the same sheet, we might not have to charge for it. The girls' colleges got two sheets each and the men's got three. The theory was that the girls weren't the men, having read the sheet, asked them to, so it was a bit of a waste to give them the same number of copies.

A cross checked survey in 1973 showed that about 5,000 people a day read the sheet and it came out 7 days a week in term. Nowadays, it comes out 3 times a week and the web version is more prominent, collecting around 5,000 visits each weekday, each visitor taking about ten minutes and looking at about 4 pages.
