THEATRE REVIEW
Tamlane
 Wadham College, Fri 26th & Sat 27th Nov: 7pm
 Wadham college breeds good things: radicalism, queer festivals, and lately the show Tamlane. Unlike some incarnations of the former two, however, every aspect of this stunningly high-quality full-length fairytale choreography is charmingly unpretentious (like the personality of its creator, Hannah Moore). Not for her - or her thirty-odd cast and crew - the post-modern or avant-gardist pretensions of some fashionable student thespians around Oxford! Tamlane is an old English tale (one rendering is available on sacred-texts.com: "the Queen of Elf-land has made me her knight!") and the ballet serves it straight up. For this is essentially a ballet - with modern elements like flamenco and salsa incorporated (much as in popular contemporary choreographer Matthew Bourne's productions).
 It's awe-inspiring to see this calibre of original dance put on by students - to original music. The entire enterprise is slickly professional, from the precision of the dancers' mutual synchronicity, to the marketing via YouTube videos, to the front of house on the night. The battle between the dark fairy and bright mortal worlds, is mesmerising.
 A few notes of caution, and reflection upon the genre Hannah Moore & Co are working within. Fairytale, by nature, mysticistic. Re-interpretations of them (for instance, via Angela Carter adaptations) may show how a certain queerness and carnival inheres in their very structure, but
