FILM REVIEW
Zero Dark Thirty [15]
 See it at the Vue, Odeon George Street and Phoenix Picturehouse cinemas.
 Think that Zero Dark Thirty is a gung-ho actioner. Then think again. Brave Two Zero it's not. Kathryn Bigelow's labyrinthine film is a forensic account of the ten year search for Osama bin Laden. Taut and unsparring, it's a head-reeling two-hour-forty minutes of pure conviction.
 In the aftermath of 9/11, Black Ops CIA operatives are getting down and dirty, torturing a terrorist. One of the bystanders is Maya (Jessica Chastain), Mark Strong (Tinker Tailor, Body of Lies), even John Barrowman (Torchwood) - adds to the sense of complexity and passing time. But most are talking heads. Only occasionally does action intrude into the film - notably the Marriott Hotel bomb attack in Pakistan, a tense covert-meeting-gone-wrong and the climactic 40 minute Navy SEAL assault.
 Bigelow wisely acknowledges global sensitivity by depicting the assault in a forensic manner, with no camera-shots of Bin Laden, alive or dead. True to its guns, Zero Dark Thirty sees it from the technicians' point of view. As with The Hurt Locker, the emotional payout is quiet and unspoken. And the film ends with an arresting, absolutely note-perfect image.
 Starkly shot, with a sometimes wobbly camera, it's a long-haul film that pitches you straight into the sweat and graft of counter-terrorism. Unlike 24, it's not an adventure. Unlike Syriana it does make sense. A thriller, yes, but it doesn't play ball. American navel-gazing perhaps. But thoughtfully, calmly and with some very long runs.

It has a pared-down, unsentimental, documentary edge
 A smattering of cameos - Jennifer Ehle (BBC's Pride and Prejudice), Mark Strong (Tinker Tailor, Body of Lies), even John Barrowman (Torchwood) - adds to the sense of complexity and passing time. But most are talking heads. Only occasionally does action intrude into the film - notably the Marriott Hotel bomb attack in Pakistan, a tense covert-meeting-gone-wrong and the climactic 40 minute Navy SEAL assault.
