THE INSECT PLAY (@ THE OFS UNTIL SATURDAY 5TH) Where fantasy and reality collide head-on with walking, talking bugs

The Insect Play, by the brothers Capek, is showing this week at the Old Fire Station Studio Theatre. It is a distinctly unusual play, concerning as it does a tramp (simply billed as "Tramp", and played by Jain Drennan), who finds himself amongst a world of anthropomophosiced insects, Whether this is reality, dream, or hallucination is distinctly ambiguous, and largely irrelevant. The Tramp watches the peculiar behaviours of the insects, and muses about the differences or lack thereof) between these creatures and the "Lords of Creation," Mankind.

ine pays maxes the wase choice of using stylised, symbolic representations for the insects, rather than attempting to produce a realistic flea costume. So we have butterflies in tallocats and cravats, daug bettels in battered hat and fingerless gloves, and a sleek (kineumon Fly with a leather coat and handgun. The Crickets, of course, wear cricket whites. The visual skyle of the production is bold, striking, and remarkably feetive. Gigantic blades of bright green gans and primary-colour costumes create an extremely convincing impression of insects going about their insecty business.

The cast is reasonably large, and the cast of characters considerably larger. Most of the actors play at least two roles, with virtually everybody parting in an appearance in the vast army of red ante in the final act. This of course makes it virtually impossible to single out any individual performance. Dremma, as the Trampa, is obviously in the focal role, but mention should also be made of Ted Hodgkinson's gloriously methachedy butterfly Felix, and Thew Jones' murderously sinister Ichneumon Fly. Although these two spring to mind at once, there isn't a bad performance in the group, and the entitle cast does superbly and the series and the superbly made of the property of the series of the property of the series of the turty orbousty used to represent different human folloss (as evidenced by the 1 ramp's repeated failure to demonstrate any real differences between Man and the inscets), Interestingly, the last group of inverbetnates we necominer is an army of Red Ants, who toil ceaselessly for the good of their state. Since the play was written in Communist Czechoslovakia, this shouldn't be too surprising, but in his production there also seem to be parallels drawn with certain other modern superpowers. The leader of the army speaks with a strong US accent, and long speeches are made about Democracy and Fighting War for Peace, in this last section, in fact, 1 rather feel that the play steps beyond state, and into out-and out preaching, indeed the Tramp seems to start speaking in lines from old War poems. (I'm fairly sure that the lines that go something like "...the battle began / Collateral damage, according to plan / And after the battle, he goes out to scan / The mountains of corpses, according to plan" ...that comes from something I've heard before).
